I am against the eruv that is permitted on public property here in Agoura Hills.

I don't think that cities should permit construction of structures of religious significance on public property.

The eruv creates a private domain. My house is now in a private domain.

I don't want to enter a special religious domain to go to my house.

I want to live in the public domain.

I do not want to cross a religious boundary to walk home from the grocery store.

If I sell my house, I will disclose to the buyers that the house is inside a city permitted religious structure.

Allowing a religious boundary on public property leads to segregation. People, like me, who want public property to be a secular space will move out. They will be replaced by people who want to live under a less secular government, a government that permits an area to be separated by a religious boundary.

Thank you
